Real-time Resilience Strategies for Coping with Coronavirus.
We have entered challenging times, requiring us all to consider how our thoughts and actions might help or hinder our own resilience and that of those around us.

Here is our brief guide to coping in the days ahead, based on the best of science but also our own (reasonably broad) lived experiences of working in emergency management and resilience training programmes over the past decade.

These are some of the practical strategies we’ve seen help.
Choose where you focus your attention.

Even at the best of times, humans are hard-wired to notice threats and weakness.

During the worst of times it is more important than ever for our psychological health to tune into what’s still good in your world.

Psychologists call this ‘benefit finding’ and it is a key resilience skill.

- Start your days or meetings with a quick-fire round of sharing good stuff – this also builds connection.

- Using the hashtag #htgs (‘hunt the good stuff’ originated in the US Army’s Military Resilience Training) works well here.
Negative emotions are contagious, and prolonged feelings of helplessness are strongly associated with depression.

Given negative emotions and experiences stick to us like Velcro, while positive emotions and experiences bounce off like Teflon, aim to punctuate your days, evenings, weeks and weekends with as many positive emotion experiences as possible.

Barb Fredrickson from the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill identifies ten different positive emotions to consider:

Love, joy, gratitude, serenity, interest, hope, pride, amusement, inspiration and awe.

Frequency, not longevity, is key.
Maintaining those connections during times of crisis and challenge is more important than ever.

Feeling isolated from others is strongly related to depression, anxiety and other forms of mental distress.

When you can’t catch up with your key supportive people face to face, find other ways of doing so.

If you’re not used to using other options such as skype, zoom, or social media apps to call, find someone who can demystify and demonstrate these for you.

Reach out. Connect.

Strong and supportive relationships are the number one predictor of wellbeing, across the lifespan.
Maintaining regular routines (meal times, bedtimes, exercise, work etc.) tells our brains it’s safe to dial that stress response back down and prevents us from feeling more anxious.

But, unprecedented times call for unprecedented responses: be prepared to have your best plans change, and open-minded enough to conjure up or accept new and different ways of doing things.

“As normal as possible, as flexible as necessary.”

Keep supportive daily routines or create new ones if you’re now holed up at home.
Focus on what matters, and what you can control.

Concentrate all your attention and resources (psychological, social, physical, emotional, knowledge) on the things that matter, and that you can actually influence.

Easy to write, hard to do we know, but worrying about things you cannot change will only upset you and frustrate you further.
Listen to your body and mind. Are you feeling overwhelmed or exhausted by your media intake? If so, it might be time to shift your focus and practice self-care.

Take a good look at your media intake over a 24 period and ask yourself, “is reading these articles, watching these videos, or reviewing these headlines, helping or harming the way I’m feeling and functioning?”

Don’t let those images, videos and notifications invade your day, your head, or your world.

If the global news is making you feel overwhelmed, take a break from it.

Claim back some control by switching them off.

Choose where you get your news updates from very carefully.
Find the right people to talk to. (Yes the helping or harming test applies to people in your life too.)

Share your thoughts and feelings, but don’t get swept up in pointless speculation.

Stick to the facts and avoid the drama queens.

Keep asking yourself:

“Is this conversation helping or harming me in my quest to feel good and function as best I can right now?”
Help yourself by helping others

This takes the attention off ourselves and we all need to feel useful and needed right now.

The research is unequivocal: being able to give as well as receive is hugely important for our life satisfaction and our resilience.

How can you help vulnerable neighbours, colleagues, friends or strangers – emotionally, physically, practically?
Avoid ‘rumination’ by giving your poor overly-busy wandering mind a rest by deliberately participating in seriously engaging activities.

Be that the crossword, Netflix, following a new recipe, dancing, listening to music or a Podcast, reading, chatting on the phone, playing dress ups with the kids, drawing, or meditating, you’ll know your thing.

This is the best way to turn off our running ruminating minds which otherwise can chew over worries, making us feel worse.

“Be kind to yourself.”
Have a ‘timed wallow’.

No good ever comes from ruminating or wallowing in misery and self-pity for over a minute – put a timer on, and then phone a friend or find something really distracting to do (see #9 above).
Remember everyone is doing their best to navigate these exceptional times.

A little kindness will go a long way.

A lot of kindness is even better (even to the drama queens).
Stress breeds unusual behaviours and can sometimes prompt us to forget the simple things like wearing our seatbelts, stopping at red lights, using Personal Protective Equipment at work, turning off taps, and thinking it's helpful to drink ourselves into a stupor. It's not.

Try to stick to your usual routines – as you’ve no doubt been reminded by now…

“This is a marathon, not a sprint.”
If over days and weeks your distress or stress symptoms are escalating, or you feel you are not coping, help and professional support is available.

If you are in self-isolation, call Healthline first 0800 611 116.

For support with grief, anxiety, distress or mental wellbeing, you can call or text 1737 to talk with a trained counsellor for free.

24 hours a day, 7 days a week.
